IT Procurement

To streamline IT procurement, companies must assess their product and service needs and let these requirements guide their selection of suppliers, says a new report from Forrester Research. By 2004, most companies will be doing hands-free procurement through e-marketplaces

IT (information technology) purchasing today is facing enormous obstacles due to manual processes and duplicated buying efforts. Strategically focused e-businesses will demand streamlined online systems that are able to handle large and complex orders quickly. Researchers believe that in order to overcome current obstacles, corporations must assess their technology buying profile, including service-level requirements and diverse product needs, before engaging in costly integration projects.
