Network Security

Who Gets In? Who Stays Out? And Who Decides?

As companies adopt networking efficiencies and integrate information technologies to grow their businesses, they continually face new security threats. Organizations must address their security risks and determine how to protect confidential company information, as well as personal, financial and other sensitive data relating to customers, suppliers, and business partners. Businesses must achieve an effective balance - maintaining robust information security while creating and operating systems that are efficient and easy-to-use.

For responsible organizations operating in the age of networked computing and electronic communication, written information security policies are essential business tools. Information security policies fundamentally reflect corporate philosophy and expectations for protection of the company's critical data. Policies that are well-written, effectively communicated and consistently enforced go a long way toward protecting companies from risks associated with the inappropriate use of systems, software, email and the Internet. They not only protect corporate information from within, but they also spell out appropriate behavior within a company to help protect against electronic attack originating from outside the organization.

An effective corporate information security program is essential to sound business practices. Many companies either don't have security policies or have policies that are wordy, hard to understand, vague, incompatible with other company policies, hard to implement or impossible to enforce. An organization's information security policies must provide a sound foundation for its overall security program. Applying the policies helps a company protect itself from undue harm and unnecessary risk.
